

Small State and Region in Southeast Asian Studies

Small State, as a prominent international phenomenon since the end of World War II, has attracted the attention and explorations of some scholars in the field of international studies. So far, the study of Small State has made remarkable achievements, but compared with the continuous evolution of Small States, it is still far from enough. The lack of studies on Small State is particularly evident in East Asia, especially in Chinese academic circles. Even in today's world that a few big States dominate international relations, Small States cannot be ignored. The research on Small State can be carried out from different research backgrounds, research levels, research fields and research purposes. Research on relevance between Small State and Region, as a research perspective, can not only promote the study of Small State, but also be a necessary step to understand the regional construction and regional development. This also applies to Southeast Asian studies.
